

Leftist Lexicon Word of the Week

The Left has an interesting relationship with the truth. Sometimes, they deny there is any truth whatsoever (usually when it's something that makes them look bad). Other times, they cloak themselves in the truth (usually when it's something that makes the Right look bad).

Lately, they've found themselves trying to do both, thanks to a new book titled Fire and Fury: Inside the Trump White House by Michael Wolff. Leftists have been salivating over the book like Oprah salivates over an all-you-can-eat buffet. Upon further review, however, the book is riddled with factual, editing, and other errors that would cause most rational people to disregard the book as trash. Wolff, and many Leftists, disagree. Wolff himself said if you feel something is true, then it is.

Tell that to my bank account when I feel like a million bucks, but only have around $5 in it.

Prepare the aspirin, because this one's gonna be painful.

What the Left thinks it means – whatever you want it to be

What it really means – what is

You would think something so simple wouldn't be so difficult for the Left to grasp. Ah, but the Left has to complicate everything so they can say things are “nuanced” and, thus, puff up their egos without doing anything to earn it.

The Left further complicates the idea of truth because of their belief truth is subjective. They believe everybody sees the same things differently, which is true to an extent, but they say personal experiences, life struggles, and the ever-present oppression creates a new framework through which truth is seen. Although those elements can add to a person's perspective on truth, they don't change truth itself. Just because an albino crossdressing little person who walks with a limp says the Earth is flat doesn't make it so. There is such a thing as observable truth, no matter how much the Left wants to pretend it's not a thing. For example, an observable truth is Carrot Top is an odd-looking dude. Try arguing against that, Leftists.

There is an underlying reason the Left treats the truth like Ike treated Tina: the truth makes it harder for them to lie. Once people know the facts, Leftists have to work that much harder to get people to disbelieve the truth and believe the lie. This can be done through a number of means, but usually it's done by denying it until the story is "too old" to be discussed (at least in the Left's view). Along the way, people who focus on the truth get called a litany of names, from the tried and true chestnuts of racist/sexist/homophobic/right wing nut job to the more popular crazy, obsessed, and bigot.

But nowhere during this process do Leftists acknowledge the truth. That would not only ruin their narrative, but it would damage their egos.

Ahhhh...methinks we've stumbled onto a deeper reason for the Left's contempt for truth. If you are committed to the truth, you have to be committed to all of it, not just the good parts. I may think I'm good enough to be a starting point guard for the Chicago Bulls, but if I don't have the skill set to be successful, I won't even be good enough to ride the pine. The Left doesn't let the negative aspects of truth get to them. They pick and choose what they want and ignore the rest. That's how Rachel Dolezal and Shawn King can claim to be black when they're make Edgar Winter look like George Hamilton. Heck, compared to them, I'm James Brown. (And for the record, I got soul and I'm super bad.)

It's this kind of thinking that makes Leftists believe Wolff's telling the truth. They want (or in some cases, need) it all to be true so they can justify their beliefs about Trump being an emotional toddler with access to the nuclear codes. If they can "prove" this, it opens up all sorts of other delusions, like being able to prove Trump is mentally unfit to be President, Trump getting impeached, even Hillary being named President (and, yes, they actually believe this will happen). And when none of it happens, the Left will find some other reason to deny the truth.

Which is good, since it gives me more to mock.

Although Leftists aren't on speaking terms with the truth, it's important we don't follow suit. Whether you think the President is the next Hitler or better than two scoops of ice cream, the truth must always be defended against those who would seek to subvert it. If we lose the truth, everything else falls after it.

And no amount of feeling the truth will bring it back.
